Bill McKibben recently wrote, "We are in an unprecedented and dire emergency, with the planet's temperature increasing quickly and dangerously; if we can't bring it under control, then it poses an existential risk to poor and vulnerable people around the planet, and then to everyone else—not to mention most of the other species, and all the generations that come after us."

Housing

Perhaps the most powerful step that San Francisco can take to reduce greenhouse gas emissions is to build more housing. Because of San Francisco's sustainable transportation options (walking, biking, transit), mild climate, green sources of electricity, strict green building standards, and low per-capita use of water, new housing built here has a lighter environmental footprint than new housing built almost anywhere else in the state. Did you support Proposition D and oppose Proposition E in the November 2022 election? Read more on our blog about prop D and prop E.

Tell us about your past environmental work, activism, etc. (200 words max)

Rachel Carson's book, "Silent Spring" and ingrained habits from home (i.e, "reduce, re-use, recycle") were impactful in how I live; we were poor and from an Indigenous background, grew our food and made new clothes out of old. That is how one lives in harmony with the Earth. When I moved to San Francisco for college, I could walk everywhere relying on transit when necessary. As an elder, I cannot ride a bike or walk as far; our solution is a small used electric vehicle powered by home solar panels. We built an ADU currently occupied by two educators and participate in CleanPower SF.

I am a member of and donate to several environmental organizations, including Earth Justice and NRDC. While Vice President of Student Learning at College of Marin, I was the instructional/student services lead in the renovation/construction of buildings designed to reduce environmental impact. At City College of San Francisco on December 7, 2023, Board or Trustees President Alan Wong introduced and I seconded, the long overdue "Resolution Supporting a Green New Deal for City College and Adopting a Climate Action and Sustainability Plan." After a second reading, we will push for District-wide implementation.
