Bill McKibben recently wrote, "We are in an unprecedented and dire emergency, with the planet's temperature increasing quickly and dangerously; if we can't bring it under control, then it poses an existential risk to poor and vulnerable people around the planet, and then to everyone else—not to mention most of the other species, and all the generations that come after us."

Housing

Perhaps the most powerful step that San Francisco can take to reduce greenhouse gas emissions is to build more housing. Because of San Francisco's sustainable transportation options (walking, biking, transit), mild climate, green sources of electricity, strict green building standards, and low per-capita use of water, new housing built here has a lighter environmental footprint than new housing built almost anywhere else in the state. Did you support Proposition D and oppose Proposition E in the November 2022 election? Read more on our blog about prop D and prop E.

Tell us about your past environmental work, activism, etc. (200 words max)

I've been a lifelong environmentalist, majoring in Conservation and Resource Studies at UC Berkeley and incorporating environmental justice and sustainability into my 30+ years of activism and leadership for economic and social justice in the San Francisco Bay Area. As District 4 Supervisor, I'm especially proud of the accomplishments I achieved with environmental and community groups creating the Great Highway Park, securing the first ever general fund investments in the Climate Action Plan and initiating planning for Sunset Neighborways and the District 4 on-demand neighborhood public transit shuttle service. As a father, I'm committed to fighting for a livable and just planet for all of our kids and future generations.
